

Arizona Apaches.

There is a story going the rounds of the press that a secret organization of 1,200 men has been formed in Arizona to attack the Apaches on the White Mountain reservation, if there should be any more outbreak on their part. It is very much to be doubted if any such organization exists, though there is very bitter feeling on the part of the settlers in that section of Arizona against these Indians. These Apaches are the meanest Indians on the continent. Treacherous and blood thirsty, from time immemorial, killing the whites wherever they could find them in parties small enough to attack without risk to themselves, sparing neither women or children, their very names have been a dread to the settlers and travelers through the country. They were never properly brought to punishment until General Crook took charge of the military department. The reservation which is called the San Carlos agency, though more commonly known as the White Mountain reservation, embraces an area of 2,528,000 acres of land. The number of Indians is 4,578. Along the stream the Indians raise corn, barley and vegetables, and it is reported to be an excellent game country, plenty of deer, bear and wild turkeys. A portion of it is good grazing land and is also said to contain minerals. Valuable coal mines have been found on the southern portion. There are living on it several distinct bands of the Apaches, governed by different chiefs, and under several tribal organizations, though acting together as the same people.

The band more immediately known as the White Mountain Apaches and against whom is entertained the strongest antipathy by the white settlers, on account of their frequent murderous forays, number but 600. Their country is, however, difficult of approach and they would make a hard fight against those who attempted to invade it. Most assuredly it will be a good deal wiser to let General Crook, again ordered to that department, manage the affair of keeping them quiet, rather than to adopt that of private vengeance, to say nothing of the lawlessness of so doing. With the immense reservation that has been assigned them, ample in every respect for their support and abounding in game, there is not the slightest excuse for their going away at any time from their reservation. They only do so for the purpose of making forays, either in Arizona or the adjoining country of Mexico. They are less afraid of Mexicans than Americans; they can slip across the boundary line and commit depredations in the absence of the Mexican troops, almost without resistance. Colonel Forsyth, in pursuing a band of these Apaches some few weeks ago, chased them into a Mexican force lying in ambush, and thus taken unawares they were nearly all massacred, but this is about the only occasion in which the Mexicans have ever got the best of them. The latest advice is that a band of these agency Apaches are raiding near Uros, in the province of Sonora, Mexico. That in the vicinity of that considerable town, they have killed forty-five persons, besides burning houses and crops; that they were armed with Winchester rifles, and the whole country is terrorized and the settlers fleeing in every direction. As these Apaches belong within our boundaries, the United States government is liable for every dollar of this damage.

If it is true, as charged, that under various pretexts they obtain permission from the agent to leave the reservation, this should at once be stopped. Every Apache of the reservation should be treated as a hostile, which, beyond doubt, he is; the sole purpose of their going away is to satisfy their devilish fondness for murder and plunder. Then, too, they should be totally deprived of their arms and ponies. These Apaches should be entirely taken away from the charge of a civilian agent and put directly under the control of General Crook. That is the very first step requisite in the efforts to check their depredations. If these few White Mountain Apaches were corralled and, after capture, all removed to the Indian Territory, there would be no trouble with the remaining bands on the reservation. This must be done, or the way they are going, they will have to be exterminated. They are, at present, but a great band of hyenas, fed at government expense, and unrestrained, constantly wandering on the highways and settlements, and gratifying their thirst for blood. The late negotiations between the United States and Mexico permit the troops of either nation to pursue marauding Indians across the boundary line. This may in a manner tend to stop their depredations, as there will be no refuge for them. Great confidence is very properly felt in Gen. Crook, and should he be left untrammelled and given full authority to do as he sees best, there is but little doubt entertained that he will end the Apache troubles in Arizona, even if he has to end the Apaches in doing so.

War Notes.

In a "skirmish" between English and Egyptian troops last Saturday, both parties retired at sunset without material damage. The English have, despite De Lessep's protest taken possession of the Suez canal. Arabi's successes have strengthened him with the native fanatics, and the number of his adherents daily increases. The Khedive is irresolute, and waits on the Turkish sultan who in turn waits on England.

The Argonaut has a long account of "An English Hero," in the last number. The hero part of it no doubt is all right, but he is just as "English" as Nugent, or O'Donnell, or Clare, or any of the Irish soldiers who always find on alien fields the merit they fail to win under their own flag.

For the third time in his unique life, Ben. Butler has been nominated for governor of Massachusetts. First, the Republicans nominated him, and were beaten; then the Democrats set him up, and Long bowled him out; this time the Greenbackers take him for a figure-head.

Five and one-half millions of dollars is the sum at the disposal of the Mississippi River Improvement Commissioners. "Tis a good round sum." One of those millions judiciously expended, would make the Columbia river entrance as safe as the entrance to New York bay.

SACRAMENTO salmon is quoted in San Francisco at $1.25@1.30. Columbia river salmon at $1.45@1.47.
